Skinned God, Blank ties together family, religion, and marriage as interconnected ideas that impact each other. He compares the Hindu reverence for cow dung with the Christian reverence for "the dead body and dead blood of a poor man nailed to a cross" and finds both illogical but contends that "All religion is shot through with illogic.

Jonah Blank

swings back and forth between India's mythological past and its only slightly less extraordinary present, alternately recounting episodes in the life of Rama--blue-skinned god of the title and hero of the 3,000-year-old epic known as the Ramayana--and his own adventures as he tracks the wanderings of Rama across the subcontinent.
